

Feminism in Indian Author Arundhati Roy's Novel

Kinjalben Chimanbhai Patel

Abstract: Arundhati Roy the author states that the "critique of capitalism in the contemporary world has to begin with a critique of globalization." This is precisely what I plan to do in research paper, exactly like how Roy did it in her activism writings. The research paper is about the plight of displaced people of India. Arundhati Roy describes how a person can be displaced from their home in the name of development and that the home chosen for them is not as good as their original home. The writer goes on to describe how the displacement of people from their native lands has been seen for two decades. The writer then states that a political party in India has been trying to improve the condition of these families. The researcher also states that in India, government and private companies have been displacing people because they want to build cities, dams, mines and industries. Roy then goes on to state that still, despite all this displacees are being used as labor free of charge by these companies and they are not even paid minimum wage. She then goes on to say that still displaced people prefer living there compared to living in rehabilitated area. Roy say even though displaced people are not happy with what is happening but they have no choice but to stay there because they do not have any other option left and the land which is being taken away from them cannot be replaced..

Keywords: Eco-feminism, feminism, women, patriarchal

REFERENCES

- [1]. Roy, Arundhati. 1997. The God of Small Things. New York: HarperPerennial. Roy, Arundhati. 1999.
- [2]. "The Greater Common Good." In The Cost of Living, edited by Arundhati Roy, 7–90. New York: The Modern Library.
- [3]. Roy, Arundhati. 2001. "The Ladies Have Feelings, So ...". In The Algebra of Infinite Justice, edited by Arundhati Roy, 131–150. New York: Penguin
- [4]. Brownmiller, Susan. Against our will: Men, Women and Rape. London: Pelican Books, 1986. Print.
- [5]. Dunayer, Joan. Sexist Words, Speciesist Roots. Ed. Carol J. Adams and Josephine Donovan. 1 edition. Duke University: Duke University Press, 1995. print.
- [6]. Estok, SC. "A Report Card on Ecocriticism AUMLA: "The Journal of Australian Universities: Language and Literature Association (2001): 220-238. Press.
- [7]. Gaard, Greta. Ecofeminism: Women, Animals and Nature. USA: Temple University Press, 1993. Print.